

What you should know about HSA rollovers

There are two different types of rollovers. Know the difference.

Trustee to Trustee

Most people want; a direct transfer of funds from your old MSA or HSA trustee to your new HSA trustee. There is no money or checks that you receive personally.

This is not technically a rollover, because a rollover means that the funds were first distributed to you. The direct trustee-to-trustee transfer is the method that is recommended because you cannot trigger an unexpected tax or disqualify the transfer since you never touch the money.

Trustee-to-trustee transfers are not subject to any tax withholding and are exempt from the one-year 60-day rollover rule. This rule states that if you rollover instead of using the direct trustee-to-trustee transfer, you must complete the rollover within 60 days by contributing the distribution from your plan to your IRA within that time frame. You are also limited to one 60-day rollover per year on that money.

Rollover method

A rollover occurs when your old trustee distributes your MSA or HSA assets directly to you. You actually receive a check. Then it is up to you to transfer those assets to your new HSA trustee within 60 calendar days after you receive the distribution from your plan. If you miss the 60 day deadline you will have to report this to the IRS, as there are tax penalties.

You may only rollover assets once in a 12 month period.

You may wish to consult a tax professional with your questions and before taking a rollover distribution. Sutton Bank does not give or offer tax advice.
